

CAREER BOOSTER: TALK NONVIOLENTLY TO ME

Ena Šelendić

Faculty of Economics and Business, University of Zagreb

Success means different things to different people, but surely, the thing that makes a difference between who we are and who we want to be is what we do now. For making a career in the STEM field, besides having excellent mathematics and analytics skills, it is necessary to develop habits that will help you reach your goals. For example, while working on challenging tasks, students often fail at trivial things such as missing the deadline due to a lack of time-management skills.

This lecture is a small reminder of simple things that are important while working on our goals. Regardless of how easy they sound, they make the key difference between those people who succeed and those who do not. At the end of the lecture, students will have the opportunity to participate in a workshop on nonviolent communication and conflict resolution.
